

Is the “target list” claim in the Trump attack case actually true?

International Relations

26 Apr 2027

Washington Attack Attempt: Trump Safe, “Kash Patel off target list” claim unverified

What exactly happened?

On April 25, 2026, an attempted attack took place during an event linked to Donald Trump at the Washington Hilton Hotel. The suspect has been identified as 31-year-old Cole Thomas Allen, who was taken into custody shortly after the incident.

According to reports, the attacker tried to breach the security perimeter and entered into a confrontation with the United States Secret Service, during which gunfire was exchanged.

Nature of the attack and response

During the incident, a Secret Service officer was struck by a bullet, but survived due to a bulletproof vest. The rapid response of security personnel prevented a major escalation, and the situation was brought under control quickly.

Trump remained completely safe and unharmed throughout the incident.

Trump’s response

Following the event, Donald Trump praised the Secret Service for their swift action. He described the attacker as “mentally unstable” and emphasized that he would not be shaken by the incident.

What about the “Kash Patel target list” claim?

Some social media posts and unofficial sources have claimed that Kash Patel was the only U.S. official not included on a supposed “target list.”

However, there is no confirmation from any official report or credible news source supporting this claim.

Authorities have not verified the existence of such a list.

Current investigation status

Investigators are currently examining the attacker's motives, background, and whether there was any broader conspiracy involved. The focus remains on establishing facts through verified evidence.